He should offer every obstruction that he could to those, every obstruction that the forms of the House would admit. He would have been happy to have voted for the bill in the shape in which it had been first sent down to them by the Upper House, but would not now assent to it until he could, at least, know that amendments were proposed in and what were not.

Mr. FIDDLINGTON said that no one would question the

that the hon. member said, however, about his not agreeing to the amendments until he knew what they were, was but a valid argument. Did the hon. member mean to say that he could not understand these amendments unless he saw them printed? He (Mr. Piddington) did not believe it. They would be in the committee what amendments were proposed in, and that was not. He thought the reasons stated by the hon.

Mr. PARKER said the matters now at issue between the two Houses were briefly these. The 9th clause of the bill as originally introduced, and as it passed this Chamber, contained a provision that in a locality where a public school was established, having in regular attendance thereat not less than three, and denominational school might be certified, a previous clause having provided that the council should have the power to establish public schools in any locality. Further on it was provided that a denominational school should be established at a greater distance than five miles, nor within two miles from the public school. The reasons why these limits were defined were there. The principle of this bill, as maintained throughout, was that There was no subsidy the means of public instruction the public expense in the first instance by schools that should open to all sects and all conditions of children. That being the principle of the bill, they maintained that it was unfair to one who paid the taxes which supported these schools to allow her schools to come into unhealthy competition with them. Still there was a sufficient number of children in the public need to make it an efficient school. In the original bill the number of children held to be sufficient was 50, but it was now reduced to 20. Large minorities of about four to one had determined that this provision should stand. He and those who were with him contended that it was impossible to maintain a night school unless there were a sufficient number of children at it to enable the Government to pay a fair salary to the teachers. On the ground of economy, therefore, as well as of efficiency, was necessary to maintain this limit on the number of children.

where. He had no objections to religious demonstrations involving their children, according to their religious belief, and even they could find thirty children in addition to the number 30 to be sufficient to form a public school, the bill allowed them have a second school, which would be a public school to all tents and parishes. Unless they had this restriction the object the bill would be defeated, because the poorer schools, which to be unsectarian, would then be Denominational. As far he could understand the arguments in favour of the amendments on this clause they proposed to entirely change the character of the bill, and after we had maintained the bill to promote education, these amendments would give denominational schools the same privileges, and place them on an equality with the public schools. Another amendment of the Council reduced the average number of children in certain schools, which was fixed provision, should be reduced to 150; and fourth, that the number of children in attendance at a denominational school, to secure its existence in January next, should be thirty instead of fifty. It would be his duty to insist upon the disagreement of the House with the first amendment. The Government attached great importance to this amendment. It contained the very basis of the measure, and unless the clause could be carried in

He therefore begged to move, — that this committee insists upon its disagreement with the Council's amendment in clause 9, the Government intended to insist upon its disagreement to the amendment in the second place, referring to the distance of five miles. The city proposed to concede, with much reluctance, to Council's amendment, reducing the number of children from 10 to 120, and also in the other, reducing the number from forty

Mr. MAUPHRESON said, in reference to the two points which the Colonial Secretary had now conceded, that the House had already insisted upon having its way in regard to them. He suggested a conference between the two Houses in regard to these statements; but if a majority of the House followed in the way the Government and insisted upon disagreeing with the Government, he did not see of what use a conference would be.

He recovered from the newspapers the grounds on which the hon. member insisted upon his amendments. The hon. member was from the report of the council as published in the Sydney Morning Herald. He thought the Upper House had done a great service to the country in trying to get rid of this disgusting bill which had as many lives as a cat. Though his arguments on this subject were vain, it had

It was argued over and over again, and the exact issue now before the House was whether the amendment of the Council should be accepted. The hon. the Colonial Secretary now said that he could not accept that amendment. He thought that the stand made by the Upper House was worthy of respect, and that their amendment should be agreed to. The Government were capable of resorting to any course to gain their ends and they might jump the Upper House; but there were members of the Assembly that they could not swap. He believed there were numbers of the House that the Colonial Secretary would like to hang, and he (Mr. Macpherson) was one of them, (laughter). He believed that the hon. gentleman would hang, draw, and quarter him if he could. Mr. PARKES: What should I do with you then? The hon. gentleman would get rid of him. (laughter). Attention was called to the state of the House.

Mr. WHITE was surprised that his hon. friend—the member for Central Cumberland—had not discovered the utter futility of opposition to the bill. He was disposed to agree with the hon. member's opinion, but he would not support him in the vote he took, with a course which had induced others to vote with his opponents. Mr. MAC-vision for future Denominational schools, we should for existences, and the bill would enable us to do that. This question must be settled by compromise, and it was unreasonable to expect that the advocates of Denominationalism should have the bill exactly as they wished it. He thought that the inducements as to number being conceded, the bill came as near to what Denominationalists wished as it was likely to come. For that reason he should support the retention of the

Mr. FORSTER said that the thirteenth clause was so effective giving the Government power to place Denominational schools wherever they pleased that in the hon. member's opinion it cured other portions of the bill, and enabled the hon. member to let it go. (Mr. Forster) consider what the hon. member meant an amendment to be a great answer. The thirteenth clause and give the Government power to foster Denominational schools wherever, and that power might lead to corruption. He would never object to most liberal assistance being given to Denominational schools, so long as it were done upon a principle.

Mr. LLOYD did not see that by agreeing with the proposition the Colonial Secretary the advocates of secular education would be giving up their principles. No one could denounce religious

...ing or place religion in a bad position. It was impossible for that the most correct Denominationalist could raise objections to the bill as it now stood, as it would not prevent the establishment of Denominational schools anywhere, though it would enable the people to have public schools if they preferred them. He would be willing to accept the bill, believing that it would provide for the educational wants of the people.

Mr. McKEITHEN said that Mr. McNEIL was the opposite in favour of the Council's amendment, and yet could vote against its rejection. If that were not voting what one's conscience, he did not know what was. The hon. member's only reason for this voting seemed to be that he (Mr. McKeithen) had adopted a certain line of conduct in his opposition. He thought that the hon. member (Mr. White), had a much better reason than that. The hon. member would perhaps under-

Dr. WHITE: Nothing that the hon. member for Central Cumberland says can be an insult to me. (Hear, hear.)

Dr. MACFARLANE reiterated his statement, and said there was great wisdom in the course proposed to be taken by the hon. member. Had little to say and much to do. The hon.

Mr. DE KALLIS said that he had never been more pained as he had been during the last few minutes. He had not sought to express what he felt with respect to the remarks of the hon. member for Central Cumberland, and he hoped that the other hon. member would answer that gentleman as he pleased.

erved. (Hear, hear.) He believed that the hon. member for Upper Hunter was as honourable and sensible a member as there was in the House. (Hear, hear, from both sides of the House.) He considered that this fruitless discussion should be ended, and he should agree with the proposition of the Colonial Secretary. He should accept the bill.

ment of hon. members, that the House would not be surprised at that gentleman's misrepresenting what he (Mr. White) said. That hon. member had distinguished himself in that way, and by attributing motives to hon. members on all occasions when they did not vote with him. That was the only way in which the hon. member had distinguished himself. (Hear, hear.) (Mr. White) had said that he agreed with all the amendments the Council, but if the House were to choose between carrying a tion none, then he preferred the part referring to numbers which be considered of more importance than the other.

 was scarcely necessary for him to have said anything in reply
 the hon. member, as the House could decide between them either be. Mr. White was likely, from his short career in the use, to have been actuated by such motives as the hon. member imputed.

Mr. McPHERSON said it was strange that when members of the Senate (Mr. De Sells and Mr. White) should say that they approved of an amendment by the Upper House; yet when the amendment was moved in this House they should have voted against it. It was strange that now they should vote for disagreement with the amendment. They were perfectly well aware at the time this amendment was proposed that it was the pivot of the whole matter, and that it was the basis of the whole case.

Mr. FORBES made some remarks in justification of what had been said by Mr. Macpherson in reference to the statement of Mr. Smith, who, he believed, was correctly represented to have said that he had had a view in common with Mr. Macpherson, but that because he took an improper course in opposition he proposed to vote against his own conscientious convictions. Probably he did not mean to say that he was in opposition to the proposition.

intended to go the length of saying that, but it appears a fair representation of what he did say.

Mr. TART rose to order, and pointed out that an irregularity had been committed in the omission to go through the paper in view to taking formal motions. This debate might last one or four days, whilst various notices on the paper might be passed at all once.

Mr. GARRETT did not think it was competent for him to de-

Mr. HART then moved that the Chairman leave the chair, and

Mr. PARKES moved that the Committee insist upon its dissent from the amendment page 3, clause 9, lines 15 and 16, striking the words, "situated not more than five miles from any public school."

Mr. MACPHERSON again adverted to the fact of several members having voted at variance with their former votes, and he said he hoped the country would recollect the falsity of their duct. The hon. member proceeded at great length to deliver on the inconsistency of the Solicitor-General, whom he denounced as having shamefully deceived his constituents in that he had professed himself favourable to the Denominational system of education, whereas in the House he was found acting in opposition to the principle then avowed. In proof of this statement the hon. gentleman quoted some remarks made by Mr. Lennox

To the Editor of the Herald.

My attention has been called to the examination before the select committee appointed to inquire respecting the Distress among the Yiddish Community. Report of said Committee recommending a protective duty of 20 per cent. upon boots, shoes, &c.

It does not appear to me that the committee desired full and correct information on some subjects, or have sought it lawfully.

For their enlightenment I give the experts of boots and shoes the Register for the nine months of the years 1865 and 1866, to Sydney, Melbourne, and Adelaide.

	First nine months for	1865.	1866.	Decrease.
Sydney—	No. of pairs	£227,273	192,248	32 per cent.
Melbourne—	" "	408,144	192,248	" "
Adelaide—	" "	61,205	38,494	" "

These figures show the combined effect of improved machinery, better material, and lower wages with all velvum and Package Duties.

I estimate the value of the boots and shoes made in the colony at nearly £400,000 for 1865, and the like in so at about £100,000, one-third of which imports have to be re-exported.

The recommendation of the committee, therefore, if carried out by Parliament would apply only to the boot and shoe trade, and not to the committee's importers, and not £400,000 as the committee assumes.

There were very few boots imported from 1848 to 1851. The colonial manufacturers had (all but) driven the English out of the market prior to the year 1851.

It will do no harm, and is doing so again very rapidly, workmen will have only to adapt themselves to the improved make and mode of manufacture, and let Protection alone.

I am, yours, &c.,
B. VICKERY.
